Commentary on the Article „Urban Future“ The article „Urban Future“ examines the lags historical shift in urban planning and the evolving role of citizens in society. It begins by describing the squalid conditions of Victorian London, which prompted Ebenezer Howard to propose „garden cities“ as a way to combine urban life with nature. A key point of discussion is the the changing perception of urbanization. While traditionally traditionally viewed as a negative spiral, many experts now consider it an advantage. For instance, economists argue that cities are essential for lifting nations out of poverty and fostering education. However, the article also presents a critical view of „greenbelts“ Although intended to limit growth, they often force people to commute longer distances, which increase resource consumption consumption. In my opinion, the environmental argument for urbanization is the most compelling. Living in concentrated areas requires fewer resources per person compared to suburban alternatives. While Howard's dream of self-contained towns was visionary, modern reality proves that cities are the primary engines of economic vitality.	Количество слов: 174
