Вопрос? The article sheds some light on the difficulties of food supply in the Middle Ages. They are mostly defined by the differences between the town and the village; the village relies mostly on the climate and its people's efforts, while the town needs the village's supply and the help of professionals to carry on its development. Under normal weather conditions, the village community met its needs fully and still had a small surplus which it used to trade with the town. Simultaneously, new food-related professions emerged in the town and various guilds were formed. In my opinion this was rather beneficial, because had the village and the town stayed equal, there would be no development in the world whatsoever. Of course, some might argue that this division created a negative tendency and led to the development of social division into classes. But that's not fully true, because there still were richer and poorer people in the village. More importantly, the difference between the town and the village allowed for culture and science to develop rapidly in cities because their inhabitants no longer had to worry about feeding themselves.	Количество слов: 187
